

Only in the Land of Dreams.

The cottonwood above them stirred its stiff, yellowing leaves weirdly, shudderingly—like the rattle of dead men's bones! The cold ran down the captain's spine. After a cowering silence:

"Say, Shang?"
"Uh-huh?"
"Do you think he'll really skin him?"
"Your mule? I—I don't know. He was awful mad!"
Another silence; then, "Ain't there a lot of stars in the world?"
Instantly, as if in response, a long, fiery streak shot across the middle sky into the blue darkness beyond. The captain's heart cramped. Every time one fell somebody was dead! His mother!

Faintly, "Shang?"
"Uh-huh?"
"Do you s'pose your mother'll be awful scared?"

It was some time before the aide-de-camp answered.
"Yes," quaveringly.
"Do—do you s'pose it would make her—sick?"
"I—I expect."

Suddenly the captain turned over on his face. A convulsive whimper floated up from the grass.

"I—weight—we—hadn't—come!"
The aide-de-camp made no reply. He, too, turned over on his face. An arm reached shyly out and rested on his shoulder. "Let's go back," a voice sobbed. The captain, the bold, the indomitable, had been the first to capitulate.

The night grew calmer. The wind died down and the clouds drifted away. Under the cottonwood hot drops trickled into the mesquite for a while, then there came a long, quivering sigh of spent grief and exhaustion; then, shortly, another. Presently the regular breathing of three sturdy pairs of lungs mingled with the sound of the cottonwood, which had died away to a faint, soft rustle.

Next evening about dusk three little boys trudged up a road toward some cottages on a hill—three pale, dry-lipped, bloodshot-eyed, weak-kneed, famished little boys. They had walked eighteen miles that day, and two of them had had nothing to eat but a pickled egg apiece in thirty hours. One was capless, and one about trousersless.

It had been a fairly eventless retreat. Once a man had given them a lift in his wagon. He had told them that by crossing a certain pasture they could lessen their journey appreciably. They had advanced within its fastnesses a half mile when a large red creature with an aggressive manner appeared over a hill and started for them. It was not a microbe, but its species had its place in the hygienic precepts of Private Bill's mother, and her son, being attired in a red waist, retraced his footsteps with celerity.

His superiors obligingly followed. This delayed them two miles distance. At a turn of the road the three prodigals parted. The smallest turned tearfully in toward a blue cottage; another, the erstwhile aide-de-camp, sneakingly toward a brow. And shortly in each house a woman was weeping endearingly into a head of tangled tow that, and a laughing, but relieved-looking man stood awkwardly by and completed the tableau of reunion.

The remaining lad stunk around to the back door of a white house further on. He lingered around the corner of the kitchen to gain courage. An exuberant puppy, spying him, came tearing up from the barn and fell upon him with joyous yelps and pawings of greeting.

In the house a man who had spent the day telephoning police stations, and a woman with red, swollen eyes, sat at the supper table. Hearing the expressions of dog delight, the woman flashed the man a questioning, faintly hopeful look. Arising hastily she hurried out to the back door. As she opened the screen to look out two arms reached in and pinioned her around the neck.

"Mamma, mamma, mamma," a voice sobbed; "I'll never do it again!"
In the dining room beyond the man, listening, gave an exclamation and arose impulsively; then paused and dropped back chuckling: "Got enough of it already, has he!"

A minute later, with an air of pleased surprise, he arose again and extended his hand cordially, as to a guest, to a furtive, wriggling small boy, shuffling miserably behind a tearful but radiant-faced woman.

"Hello, hello, how's everything? Traveling good?" he inquired heartily. The captain shook hands, twisting his neck in an agony of embarrassment. "Yes, sir," he mumbled. Then he looked up and met the eyes twinkling down upon him. He smiled back sheepishly. He fell limply into his chair at the table. His mother sat and blissfully watched him eat, her own plate untouched. There had been no time for questioning as yet. She would have been horrified had she known how very empty he was. His father looked down at them, the twinkle in his eye deepening.

"Freedom is only in the land of dreams, and only blooms the beautiful in song," he quoted laughingly; "Eh, son?"
